The Forgotten Two Per Cent

Increasing public awareness has focused on recent years on the plight of the homeless and the problem of poverty in major cities. In the United States, it has been estimated that there are at least 200,000 homeless people living in the streets of major cities.

One of the major causes of homelessness is the lack of affordable housing. In many cities, the cost of housing has increased so much that it is impossible for low-income families to afford a place to live. This has resulted in a growing number of people living in shelters, on the streets, or in their cars.

Another cause of homelessness is the lack of access to healthcare. Many homeless individuals do not have access to medical care, which can lead to serious health problems and even death.

The Forgotten Two Per Cent represents a significant portion of the homeless population, and it is important that we work to address the root causes of homelessness and provide support to those who are affected by it.
